It is brought to us in flat cakes or masses very heavy and of a dense texture, not perfectly dry its colour is a dark brownish yellow, its smell is of a dead faint kind, and its taste very bitter and very acrid It is brought from Natolia, Egypt, and the East-Indies, produced from the white garden poppy, with which the fields of Asia Minor are in many places sown. When the heads grow to maturity, but are yet soft, green, and full of juice, incisions are made in them, and from every one of these a few drops flow of a milky juice, which soon hardens into a solid consistence. The finest opium proceeds from the first incisions. What we generally have is the mere crude juice, worked up with water or honey sufficient to bring it into form Externally applied it is emollient, relaxing and discutient, and greatly promotes suppuration. A moderate dose of opium taken internally is generally under a grain, yet custom will make people bear a dram, but in that case nature is vitiated. Its first effect is the making the patient cheerful; it removes melancholy, and dissipates the dread of danger, the Turks always take it when they are going to battle. it afterwards quiets the spirits, eases pain, and disposes to sleep. After the effect is over, the pain generally returns in a more violent manner; the spirits become lower than before, and the pulse languid. An immoderate dose of opium brings on drunkenness, cheerfulness, and loud laughter at first, and, after many terrible symptoms, death itself. Those, who have accustomed themselves to an immoderate use of opium, are apt to be faint, idle, and thoughtless; they lose their appetite, and grow old before their time. Hill.

To death's benumbing opium as my only cure Milton
